I don't think any professor gives a take-home test with the expectation you're going to sit down and do it with no assistance. If they wanted that, they'd just do it as a regular test. From my experience, if they do a take-home, they usually make it harder because you will have more time and more resources to do it.

But a take-home exam tests a student's ability to look up the answers. Why does my prof want to know if I am capable of looking stuff up? A good (or even perhaps a mediocre) take-home exam does not test a student's ability to look stuff up. It tests students' critical think and problem solving abilities, in a way that can actually be difficult ...
